Decolonising Global Health

'THE TIMES THEY ARE A-CHANGING': an old song, a new reality. We all experience the effects of global crises, whether as result of climate changes or failing (economic, political, or societal) systems. Understanding and grasping the determinants underlying these global crises, and their disproportionate effect on vulnerable people, is necessary to instigate CHANGE. This exploration cannot be done without addressing the consequences of political and economic structures of the past and the colonial reality that shaped (and continues to shape) societies at large.

The aim of the DECOLONISING GLOBAL HEALTH event is to jointly reflect on the implications of DGH for us, global health professionals and students. Starting point for this journey is to share and learn from collective and individual perspectives on the theme. We will explore the colonial impact on health systems, and on social injustice and health inequities worldwide.

Some of the dilemmas and questions we will discuss include:

- What does DGH really mean to any of us, considering your personal story?
- What does it mean for your functioning as a global health student or professional working within an institution that reflects (neo)colonial structures or practices?
- What are the characteristics of genuine and equitable partnerships (in global health practice, and in academic systems)?
- How can I increase my awareness of (colonial) patterns around me and become part of the CHANGE?

The day will close with award ceremonies: Sauerwein Medal, winners of the KCGH thesis prize, and graduates from the GH MD training programme.
